Flour, eggs, sugar . . .
and a touch of magic.

It's no secret that grandmothers know about magic more than anyone else, and Kole's grandmother is no different. At Nana's house, Santa never misses a visit and the tooth fairy leaves only the shiniest of quarters. Little does Kole know that Nana has been keeping a magical mixing bowl right there in her kitchen; and when she brings it out to make her special green dinosaur pancakes, the enchantment—and the pancakes—come to life.

This is not a well-behaved breakfast. These prehistoric pancakes roar, soar, and stomp around Nana's kitchen. Syrup flies, butter drips, and charm abounds as Kole and his pancakes give exciting new meaning to the phrase "playing with your food." Inspired by the author's experience making green dinosaur pancakes with her dad, this delightful story by Kat Pigott features whimsical drawings by teen illustrator Mason Sibley. No matter what era you're from, this rawr-some tale is part of a complete (and spellbinding) breakfast.

Nana's house was a magical place. It was a place where the tooth fairy left shiny quarters. A place where Santa actually ate all the cookies and drank all the milk I left for him on Christmas Eve. A place where the Easter Bunny left big, golden eggs in plain sight.

So what happened next was no surprise.

"Kole, what do you want for breakfast?" Nana called from downstairs. "We have cereal, sunny side ups or toast. We can even make GREEN dinosaur pancakes."
